

A Mighty Wind

On an item in last week's All the News That Fits column:

I have used and shared Gentle Wind Project (GWP) instruments for several years, and have seen extremely positive results in myself and others. Therefore, I was angered at Frank Rubino's dismissive and cavalier tone in his article about the GWP. There is an enormous body of meticulous documentation on the GWP's 21 years of research--hundreds of pages I have seen myself.

There have been blind and double-blind studies done. A major East Coast university has approved a phase-one clinical trial studying the healing effects of the GWP instruments. And physicians, nurses, dentists, therapists and social workers use GWP instruments with patients in hospitals, clinics and private practices around the world.

I'm writing in response to Frank Rubino's item entitled "Oh How the Gentle Wind Blows." It seems to me that when a journalist writes negatively about a 21-year-old nonprofit organization that has developed a proven effective healing technology, the journalist has the obligation to show documented evidence to substantiate what he has written.

The Gentle Wind Project studies and develops alternative and complementary healing technologies that support mental and emotional health. The technology comes in the form of handheld healing instruments.

The funding for the Gentle Wind Project comes from those who have used the technology and found it helpful. Most of our donors are healthcare professionals who have seen relief in their patients that they can directly attribute to the Gentle Wind technology.

At no time have the healing instruments been for sale, as Frank Rubino's article implies. At no time has Gentle Wind ever claimed that the healing technology "will fix everything that's wrong with you," and at no time has Gentle Wind ever been "bilking people" out of money, as Frank Rubino's article states.
